Analítica

In the mid-1980s, problems relating to land in the western Santa Catarina region gained prominence in several newspapers. The emergence of context and role of social movements in the field added to several existing problems in the region marked a period in which it was approached as a space of constant "conflicts". In this scenario, we highlight the movement of resumption of land Awning Chibanguê by Kaingang indians in the early 1980s. This mobilization of the indians faced strong resistance from the families of settlers who lived in the lands claimed, triggering a context of disputes monitored and reported in written press state. The news coverage of the newspaper O Estado - statewide newspaper, based in Florianópolis, SC - made the issue circulate in different regions of Santa Catarina. More than facts and information, discourses and representations were also spread, regarding of a region historically known for problems and disputes over land. This article then aims to understand how the newspaper presented this issue and how certain meanings and representations were built on the dispute between Indians and settlers. The newspaper publications analyzed range between 1982 and 1985, the partial demarcation of the land claimed by the Kaingang
