Analítica

When contributing to social reform or addressing socio-economic and health inequalities, occupational therapists must have a commitment to occupational justice. Appropriate occupational-therapy practice can and should operate at the community and population level (1). This is particularly evident in the transitional countries of Europe, such as Romania, Bulgaria and Georgia, where an absolute majority holds social injustice as the main driver of social exclusion processes (2). In these countries issues of poverty and unemployment of disadvantaged groups like disabled people cannot be resolved by individual solutions. However since the economic crises vulnerable groups in the whole of Europe are experiencing occupational deprivation and injustice. These issues can be more effectively addressed through the use of a community-development approach. The development of occupation based collective approaches in which all individuals find their place is an essential step towards combating poverty, occupational deprivation and developing the concepts and practices necessary for an inclusive, occupational just community(3). The focus is then on addressing the occupational needs, occupational rights and obligations of all citizens. In this article community based programmes and strategies which are under development and/or have been used by occupational therapists will be discussed
