Analítica

Within the framework of a research whose objective was to diagnose the impact of migration in Colombian transnational families, a focus group was applied in order to inquire about family and to learn which factors make easier or more difficult the adaptation of the migrant. The group was composed by eight Colombian people, heterogeneous in terms of age, gender, family and marital status, employment/academic backgrounds and motivation to migrate. The central question of the debate was the migrant's perception of the migration process and how it could be improved. This was addressed through a comparison between the Colombian and Spanish family and educational models and making suggestions of improvement. The group perceived migration as the consequence of serious problems within the Colombian society leading to a fight for survival. The family was acknowledged as the support of the process, a number of requests were made to our society and ways to reinvest in their country the earnings obtained in Spain were proposed
