Analítica

In recent years, concern about urban mobility has been gaining in importance as a public issue due to the social and ecological effects involved. In this paper, we present a study of the behaviors and perceptions of university students who use a car or bicycle for transportation as they ride around in Gran Concepción. We followed three lines of analysis: First, we studied the effect of specific behavior patterns on mobility among motorists and cyclists. Second, we studied the types of communication between different social actors involved in the phenomenon of urban mobility. Finally, we looked into how travel method modified the drivers' perception of their body in both vehicles. To conclude, we propose some reflections that could shed light on the complex scenery that urban mobility represents
