Analítica

Throughout this article we understand unpaid care work as an indispensable work for preservation and reproduction of human life, so we highlight the need for its visibility and social recognition. Based on the review of academic bibliography, we ask about the specificity of unpaid childcare work, its conceptualization as an informal labor, the social organization of care, and the recognition of some basic normative principles for their regulation and protection. As a result, we highlight how, although in recent decades it has been possible to consolidate a care agenda in the region based on a rights-based approach with a gender perspective, there is still a long way to go before such commitments can be translated into universal policies that would transform the unjust and unequal production and distribution of care
