Analítica

A key debate in contemporary anthropology seeks to subvert the nature/culture division and redefine the research context to consider non-human entities as immanent agents of meaning. This article exposes several approaches to this topic. It focuses on their disagreements, shared points and productive frictions. It points out that these theorizations involve three interwoven questions: what is agency, who and what has the capacity for agency? Do we inhabit one or several worlds? And, should we abandon the opposition nature/culture and replace it with the concept of ontology? This comparative exercise allows us to map the specificities of the new disciplinary stakes and is useful to assess their shortcomings and potentialities
