Analítica

In analyzing a State's policies and strategies in foreign policy, we are driven to examine the circumstances within which it acts. In this way, governments framed by the 1950s correspond in the history of contemporary international relations with the crossroads in world policy known as the Cold War, or belligerent peace, specifically in its evolutionary phase (1953 - 1960) and its implications in the Latin American dimension. The aim of this study comprises an analysis of the juncture policies that had an influence over the development of diplomatic relations between Venezuela and Argentina in the period of 1955 - 1957. It was a two-year period that was shaped - in both countries - by strengthening relations and incompatible policies that find their high point in the policy of asylum implemented by the Marcos Pérez Jiménez government of Venezuela in favor of the ex Argentinean President Juan Domingo Perón in 1956
