The facts in a process are as they have been demonstrated, and not as they occurred in reality. In turn, truth in a process is a difficult goal that can be reached according to the degree of probability or confirmation related to what proposed by the parties: therefore, in a process one deals with a concept of truth characterized by validity. To develop the above, this article of a legal-reflective nature is developed from a perspective of qualitative research based on bibliographical review and its primary objective is to describe and analyze the importance of facts in law, as well as their relationship with truth and evidence within a judicial process
