Analítica

This paper analyzes a case of formation and development of a settlement in the southern periphery of the city of San Miguel de Tucumán that occurred during the first five years of the 1970s, an issue that arose in the context of an investigation into family life strategies in context of urban poverty. We will see the development of a process that begins as a settlement until it becomes a neighborhood with a regular or formalized situation regarding the ownership of the land under occupation. In the first part we proceed to a brief theoretical exploration of the problem of informal urbanization in the Latin American and Argentine context; considering it as an expression of a set of broader social facts that constitute the informal economy. Subsequently, the analysis of the case in question is carried out, whose empirical support comes from the field information collected in the form of field records (field observations and dialogues with neighbors) and unstructured interviews conducted with neighbors who were participants and witnesses of the processes. that make the interest of this article
