Analítica

Chris Harman manifests that the current financial crisis is in reality a systemic crisis. Based on this affirmation, this paper attempts to study in depth the causes that have generated this systemic crisis, analyzing some reactions by the right (Quiggin, Smati, etc.), both its most conservative wing as well as reformist approaches. Also, it is important to point out that, starting from a concept of science understood as Wissenschaft, as rational and systematic process, it can be shown how technological development, impelled by the capitalist system itself, has provoked a valorization crisis that in the end makes it impossible to obtain surplus value, since this interrupts the circulation-reproduction process of capital. This thesis permits gathering fundamental elements for the critique of capitalism from authors such as Henri Mora, Sergio Reuben, David Harvey, etc., as well as recovering some ideas by Marx developed in Capital and Grundrisse. Within this framework, it proposes Marxism as a valid option for analyzing and overcoming the political and economic contradictions that late capitalism generates and that imply a gradual wearing down of bourgeois democracy. Finally, this essay is an optional approach to the current crisis from a perspective that does not require a mastery of economic science but does not lose its scientific value
