The Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) represent, according to some, the most ambitious global initiative to renew and advance the international development agenda, allowing progress in reducing world poverty by 2015 through a plan action based on a combination of novel targets, which are specified in a series of measurable indicators and applicable worldwide. Conversely, there are many who argue that the MDGs represent the recognition of the failure of a struggling global policy of development cooperation carried out to date, dramatically lowering of the commitments agreed by the international community in previous years, focusing more on addressing the consequences of poverty, to know and change the structural causes that lead. Possibly both positions are necessary to adequately assess the true scope of the MDGs and their potential application in the official policies of cooperation. The MDGs could mean an opportunity to bring more precision to the ODA policies, allowing a substantial improvement in the effectiveness of actions. But we must know the actual possibilities and limitations of the MDGs in line with the recommendations that have emerged in reports by the United Nations and not ignore the new scenario has opened up the global systemic crisis we traverse
