Analítica

The article analyzes some cases (among the many found) of black women inciting judicial officials (and also police) in their favor. We will investigate these black female actions through small court documents, generated by conflicts involving neighborhoods. We will emphasize the black women's agencies that are already women, protagonists of demands for respect and social recognition, since this segment still lacks research on this subject. With this, we seek to understand the formation of ethnic solidarities, but also of how these women invested in pluriracial social relations, not being absolutely possible to characterize them by social anomie, much less by marginality. Using the margins of the judiciary for their protection, these black women justified being deserving of state support for their poverty (sometimes questioned, as we will see) and for the social consideration about being workers and enjoying the neighborhood's friendliness
