Analítica

The launch of the new gender law (21,120) by the end of 2018, it has been issued after almost five years of tense parliamentary discussion. This law grants the civil right to citizens to change their sex and name on identity documents, which has begun complex discussions among conservative groups that talk of gender ideology. This study aims to identify and describe parliamentary evaluative stances within discussion during the legislative project processing. The analysis is drawn on critical discourse studies (CDS henceforth) and the appraisal system, where the object is to explore the hate speech configuration within discussions about the gender identity law at the Parliament in Chile. The findings show that discursive verbal violence appears highly evoked; a discourse of hatred toward transgender people is recognized but expressed through apparent intentionality of 'good', generally characteristic of right-wing parliamentary
