Analítica

This article analyzes gender relations in textile factories in Rio de Janeiro, highlighting the conditions of female labor in the early years of the twentieth century, as well as the modes of resistance employed by weavers in the face of various types of exploitation. Textile woman workers worked long hours in unhealthy environments, received lower wages than men did, and were seen by the latter as competition. However, several weavers collectively struggled for better working and living conditions. This study approaches these actions carried out both inside and outside factories
