The essential elements of democracy are freedom of access to information, respect for freedom of expression and the guarantee of the right to information. In this context, communication is attributed the role of strengthening democracy One of the purposes of communication is citizen participation in matters of public interest. The quality and quantity of publicly available information speaks of society's democratic maturity and level of transparency. The cybernetic model considers the organization of society based on an emerging commodity that is information. Society now opens a new battleground over control of information. The institutions of government define the access to information from its regulatory powers and civil society respond with the control of power, of rulers and their decisions through the use of information and communication technologies. In turn, control the Internet and mobile communications is the replica of despotic governments to social movements. Mexico plays a pioneering role in the regulation of access to public information through the adoption of the Federal Law of Transparency and Access to Public Government Information in 2002. In Colombia, on May 8, 2013 the Constitutional Court formally announced the constitutionality of the Law on Transparency and Access to information and the declaration of the constitutionality of 22 of the 35 items that form it
