Analítica

This article focuses on the increasing use of constitutional right and the law to face socioenvironmental problems, as a characteristic that assume both environmentalists struggles and the regulation and organization of the environment in formation. The paper analyzes the legislative production of mining industry regulations in Argentine provinces, through processes of active participation in environmental assemblies for their elaboration. It is analyzed particularly the character of social participation on legislative production, and the semantic spaces that founded agreements (and disagreements) between legislators and assemblies when subscribing a restriction of certain mining uses -see as specific solution to the mining problem-, and the transformations of the environmentalist identity during the course of the legal action. The paper allows to observe the construction of environmental sustainability of development through socio-legal activism, and the tensions between democracy -as a majority formula- and the defense of the right to a substantive environment, in the promotion of social and cultural change. In a more transversal way, the article glimpses the transformations of social "territorial" movements in Argentina from the 1990s onwards, and aims to contribute to their discusión
