Today the administrative science has been an object of controversy from the epistemological point of view. It is those who consider it to be a real social science and others doubt his scientific status. The objective of this work is to show the different epistemological problems that must face the administrative science and that go from the considerations as for his object of study, methodological status up to the relation between the investigation and the administrative practice. One concludes that the administrative science, she is considered to be a sociotecnología (Bunge, 1999), must mate to the administrative practice from a perspective that Bachelard (1978) named as "vigilance of the vigilance" and the abandon of the intuitionism to be able to face to diverse obstacles epistemological that will arise from the extreme normativism, the radical empiricism or the idea of neutrality.
