Analítica

The empirical development of the neo-Whorfian programme has been very fertile in the last decade. In this work, I review the most outstanding studies within this programme, and discuss the results, in order to establish the version of the relativistic hypothesis that is vindicated. I argue that the conclusion best supported by the evidence is that language plays a reconfigurational role, transforming previous thinking capacities, in terms of greater abstraction and flexibility. The relativistic effects identified, though, don't support a grand conclusion regarding the importance of the cognitive differences that stem from linguistic differences among speakers of different languages
