Analítica

This article is part of a research on experiences and representations related to the housing crisis and participatory dynamics in Stop Desahucios Salamanca; we present a first approach to the subject, analyzing the phase prior to participation in the social movement. We propose the use of a sociology and anthropology from the body to problematize the meanings and representations that reconstruct the experience of the housing problem at a time prior to participation in Stop Desahucios Salamanca. The research technique used are the semi-structured interviews. The data produced are analyzed from three categories that link different approaches to the body: the social trajectory, the body in pain and the disease. The results indicate that, in the period before participating in Stop Desahucios Salamanca, social context and bodily experience reconstruct the housing problem from an analogy to the disease
