Analítica

This article examines the establishment or shaping of political corruption as a criminal or reprehensible conduct by the great thinkers of world history. In this way, it will analyze from a historical-philosophical approach the causes and possible measures to combat corruption - administrative, fiscal, or legal (criminal) - that the different philosophers have given to the septic phenomenon throughout the centuries. A chronological journey through the different historical periods will be made, considering the facts of the time, and contextualizing the theories of each of the thinkers mentioned here, influenced by the circumstances contemporary to their development. Finally, the solutions to corruption that were sought since ancient times are analyzed, many of them like those imposed today - with the only exception of the temporal distance and its correlative adaptation. In some cases, some of the proposals devised centuries ago were more genuine than those tried today. It is proposed to revisit the anti-corruption tools of the most relevant theoreticians and scholars of history to re-create and re-think the instruments, applicable to our days, to fight against the degenerative problem of politics; either by copying these philosophical proposals absolutely, or by using these fixed bases to establish effective responses to the problem
