Analítica

Bogotá since 1998, through the instruments of urban planning, has been building representations and meanings about its territory. However, when reviewing its implementation through land management instruments, conflicts arise to carry them out, uncovering political struggles crossed by the technical aspects of the city. This being the case, this research aims to analyze the trajectory of land management instruments used in Bogotá, during the period 1998-2018, through a public policy approach in order to determine the existing city models in practice, based on the documentary and systematic review of government plans and other civil action tools related to land management. As it is verified among the primary results of the investigation, the case of continuity of a city project formulated since the beginning of the 21st century, whose intentions of modification by some governments have not achieved profound transformations beyond a rupture in values, norms and images about the city, allows us to glimpse in Colombia a general framework of stability around an urban planning system through the set of land management instruments available to governments in urban territories, which presents in practice a series of challenges to comply
