Mexico City is the second most populated and aging federal entity in the Republic of Mexico; it is distinguished from other parts of the country by the levels of social and human development, public and private infrastructure, as well as a political agenda that includes social policies, and legal frameworks, simultaneous to national policies, focused on social development of specific groups such as older people. Within these governmental projects has begun a focus on the study of the phenomenon of discrimination against social groups, arising the case of older people, but where ageism and prejudice to aging are complementing the expressions of discrimination. The aim of this paper is to analyze the levels and perceived dimensions where discrimination is exercised in older people in Mexico City and other parts the country, reviewing analytical and quantitative results of the first National Survey on Discrimination (2005), which gives an overview of macro and mezzo discrimination against this population. The results show differences about priorities, responsibilities and solutions to discrimination in areas such as the perception of equality in law, the rights to health and labor; proving differences that could be related with higher social development and, at the same time, they appear as result of the social and political actions of the government of Mexico City towards the aging process of older people. This study aims to contribute to the discussion on the transformative role of social policies and the laws within the specialized judicial system
