Analítica

Historiography and social science in general have analyzed the role of the military forces as key central actors in the Argentine political scene. However, its specific actions within state and military management companies and the concurrent development of labor relations have had little attention. This paper poses an approach to this issue by addressing the relationships between management and labor organization and struggle in the case study of Astilleros Río Santiago during the last phase of Import Substitution Industrialization. This brief paper aims to analyze the complex relationship between two social processes in 1974-1976. We address the process of grassroots organization and mobilization at the Río Santiago Shipyard (Astillero Río Santiago) in dialogue with those management actions and practices that can be defined as a sort of authoritarian paternalism. It is our hypothesis that the display of disciplinary, coercive and repressive measures over the workforce pursued the hegemonic recomposition of the military order in the factory prior to the 1976 Coup d'Etat.
