Analítica

Tourism "peer to peer" (p2p) is one of the major global trends that is transforming the way of travelling and consume. Transport by road, accommodation, destination experiences, restoration... Virtually all sectors of the tourism industry have been already affected by the so-called "shared economy". In particular, p2p websites have burst in the accommodation sector, becoming in a few years in a threatening competitor for the hotel sector and regulated apartments. They say that this new intermediary do not operate with the same rules that the legally registered tourist establishments, which leaves them in worse conditions. For tourists, it implies significant advantages, although it is not without some important risks, as it is the case of default by the host of their obligation. From a legal point of view there is no a clear approach, although it is a phenomenon whose numbers are increasing. Among other issues, considering that is applicable regional regulations. The aim of this paper is therefore to identify the problems generated from a legal standpoint, particularly with regard to the regulation of these new intermediaries and protection of tourists.
