Analítica

This paper tackles the design and implementation of the medicalcooperativemodel in Costa Ricabetween 1986-1990, through the decision-making process. It is argued that these cooperatives were created as a result of the state contraction process that limited institutional expansion,together with the climax of the concept of economic democracy and decision-makers exposure to international ties. In spite of institutional resilience to medical cooperatives, and the weaknesses of their design and implementationstage, this modelhas set in motion a hybrid social security trajectory, in which the incorporation of privateproviders mainly dependson decision makers'interpretation of institutional unfeasibility
