In this article we focused on the transformation of the queen consort role in the Late Middle Ages. This evolution was driven by a difficult war context such as the War between the Crown of Castile and the Crown of Aragon. The also known as the War of the Two Peters was an extensive and complex conflict that faced the Crowns of Castile and Aragon between 1356 and 1366 and with skirmishes and specific episodes until 1375. Although the conflict seemed limited to the differences and ambitions of both monarchies, soon it involved the rest of the Iberian monarchies and some European ones, taking part for each of the sides. The expansion made diplomacy a fundamental instrument for the development and conclusion of the conflict. The long duration had political, military and financial consequences but it also served to redefine the administrative framework of the monarchy. In this paper we will analyse the role of Eleanor of Sicily as lieutenant in the most difficult years of the war. In the summer of 1363, when the king travelled to Valencia to lift the siege of the Castilian troops, Queen Eleanor was in charge of procuring everything necessary, especially financial resources. The analysis of the queen's actions during her tenure in 1363 shows the difficulties to ensure the payments the Kingdoms had committed themselves. At all times, Queen Eleanor transmitted her message as a representative of the monarchy and the needs of the king, who at that time needed to project an image of strength during the peace negotiations. The queen herself pressured the territorial authorities to obtain financing for the king's troops. In 1364 the queen was again appointed lieutenant that year, collaborating in the sale of the royal patrimony. But if Eleanor's political activity during this tenure has been remembered for something, it is because of her role in the indictment and condemnation of Bernat de Cabrera, King Pedro's most important adviser to date. The queen initiated the accusation
