Analítica

In this article, I consider as a central issue the recurring connection between the writings of Alfredo d'Escagnolle Taunay about the Paraguayan War and Euclides da Cunha regarding the War of Canudos, authors who respectively held the position of "military correspondent" during the mentioned wars. While investigating this relationship, I examine the construction of a specific historiographical framework within the writing of war history, under the label of "military literature," for which the works of Taunay and Cunha were positioned as equally exemplary by some of their readers, assessors, and promoters
