Analítica

This article takes the perspective of the psychologist who attends and conducts research in Brazilian public health services. Through open individual interviews, based on one triggering question, with eleven adults who had a tumor of the Central Nervous System in childhood, it aims to discuss how the situations of racism reverberate in the psychological clinic, impact the listening of the professional and demand that he/she self-position in the clinical-political interface in the institution in which he/she operates. As a result, it brings some speeches collected in the interviews that exemplify discriminatory issues and discusses from the conceptualizations of Freudian psychoanalysis and the philosophy of Foucault, Agamben and Mbembe. It reflects on interventions by the psychologist in order to refuse the perpetuation of racism in the management of the cases treated and defends that this is not his/her exclusive function. Thus, it highlights the social role of the health professional that needs to be discussed in academic training so that all of them can be involved with the disruption of discriminatory narratives and actions
