Analítica

This article aims to understand - in an interdisciplinary perspective, articulating Geography with other areas of knowledge, especially with History - the socio-spatial organization of female prostitution in the city of Planaltina (Federal District, Brazil) in the years 1998 and 1999. Between the main areas of female prostitution identified in the Federal District (Brazil), the satellite city of Planaltina stood out for presenting a female prostitution of the traditional or "classic" type, aimed at for care in prostitution houses / bars. The adopted methodology, constituted in a predominantly qualitative approach. It was possible, through observation and interviews, to characterize female prostitution in the city, and to identify the occurrence of an institutional intervention on the territory of prostitution that impacted on the activities of the women who worked there. From this study, it was possible to understand that prostitutes have a great capacity to adapt to cities, making forced state interventions ineffective and that do not consider the group's interests. With this, we seek to stimulate the overcoming of the view of the territory of prostitution "per se", to envision it as a place of life and feelings
