Contemporary residential architecture is a clear reflection of social and economic change. Leaving aside the familiar terraced homes found on so many housing estates, this architectural field is producing novel, innovative designs showing technical advances in construction which reflect their owners requisites and preferences. New family models and a greater degree of occupational mobility are just two of the many factors currently redefining the home. Owners today have access to more information, are far more knowledgeable of architecture and interior design, and have a much better defined idea of their requirements. Hence, projects are built to meet specific demands and solutions are devised individually for each client. We find instances where huge windows break down the barrier between indoors and outdoors, flooding the home with natural light; where ample multiple-function spaces or rooms are fully customised for specific uses; where studies and work areas are clearly distinguished from living and resting areas, and where bedrooms have become a secluded, intimate part of the house. In todays home anything is possible
